Description

Views and more views—where The Sound of Music meets Spearfish, South Dakota. Perched on a south-facing hillside at Spearfish’s west end, this thoughtfully crafted home borders National Forest Service land and looks out to Crow Peak with miles of wilderness to explore. Built by Lonnie Humbracht, it offers privacy, room to gather, and a rare sense of connection to the landscape—all about 30 minutes from downtown and close to the Wyoming border. Set on 34 acres with light covenants, the property welcomes grazing animals and features a seasonal creek, canyon walls, and abundant wildlife. Mule deer, whitetail deer, turkeys, and elk in the area are visitors you can call neighbors. It’s a peaceful retreat with space to roam, create, and settle in. The open-concept main level is designed for everyday comfort and easy entertaining. Large Marvin picture windows draw in the views, while the spacious kitchen features custom knotty hickory cabinetry with roll-out drawers. Teak flooring, custom cabinetry throughout the house and a generous laundry room add warmth and function. The west-facing primary ensuite offers a lighted tray ceiling and walk-in closet, set apart from the two guest rooms on the east end of the main level. There’s room for hobbies and projects, too: an attached, heated 908-square-foot garage with workshop space, plus a separate 2,400-square-foot shop with a concrete floor, floor drain, power, and 12-by-10-foot and 15-by-8-foot overhead doors. Two gas fireplaces, a basement wet bar, and an entertainment area with walkout access to the hot tub make it easy to host friends or curl up on the couch for a quiet evening. Outside, step from the kitchen onto a partially covered TREX deck that stretches the length of the home. Facing north, it’s a natural spot for grilling and taking in panoramic views across the plains. End the day around the gas plumbed firepit beneath a sky full of stars. Additional feature: The roof was replaced in 2019.
